Boat noises make teaching harder

Do the people who plan the Hydrobowl racing schedule ever take into consideration that Mad River School is in session during the month of May?

Since we do not have the luxury of air conditioning and therefore have to have our windows open in our classrooms, this causes quite a problem. It is difficult enough to motivate students to learn today without trying to do it over the buzzing of a powerboat engine.

Last month, some of our court judges in Dayton cancelled court trials because of noise caused by construction crews. Should we do the same? Or maybe the National Commission on Excellence in Education could include this problem in its study.

Or just maybe the almighty dollar has made powerboat racing more important than education.
